Homepage of <https://mrlizhaozhi.github.io/>

Yesterday, I reopened my GitHub account and updated my personal website. The new website is now accessible at <https://mrlizhaozhi.github.io>. All previous versions of the website are still available at <https://mrlizhaozhi.github.io/archives/>.

While there are still a lot of work to be done, I believe this is a good time to make my website public. On this website, you can find my self introduction, previous and in-progress projects, articles, resume, and public profiles, etc. Since GitHub Pages can only host static websites, I have decided to move all the blog posts to Medium. Please follow <https://medium.com/@mrlizhaozhi/> for future updates.

The new website is built using Bootstrap. The reason for using this framework is to ensure consistency in the design of the website. The new website is responsive to screens. It has less pages than before because I want to make it easier for you to navigate and for me to maintain. I believe it is more efficient to edit and publish articles on blogging platforms with content management systems such as Medium than creating static webpages each time I write new blog posts.

I have also simplified the navigation menu by making it available on every webpage and removing unnecessary links. You can find three buttons — home, projects, and resume — on the navigation bar.

Moving forward, I will continue to update and maintain the website to include more information. Please visit my website frequently for updates.

Cheers,

Li Zhaozhi
